
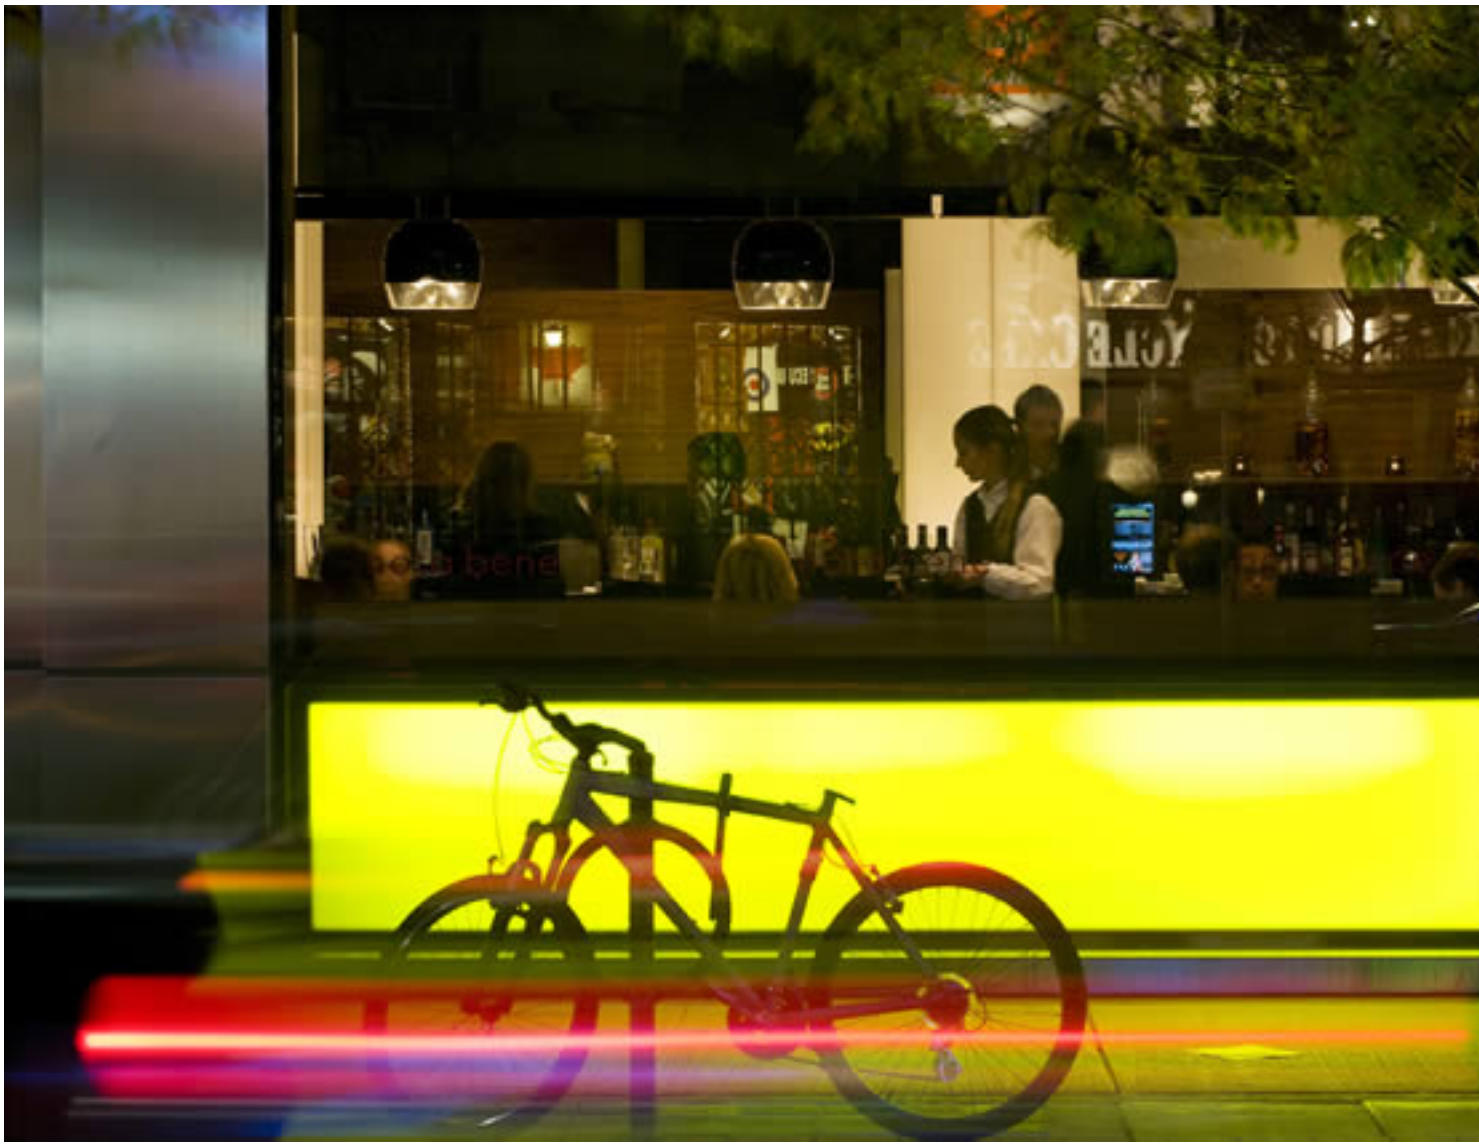
Nota Bene is a new destination restaurant located in the base of One Eighty Queen West, a commercial property sited at the northwest corner of downtown Toronto's financial district area.

The primary occupants of the tower are the Federal Judicial Courts. It sits between east edge of the “legal district” which includes Osgoode Hall, the Ontario Courts Building at 361 University Avenue, Old and New City Halls and the historic Campbell House, the original home of the first chief justice of Ontario, and the western threshold of the vibrant Queen Street West commercial retail district. It is also within a short walking distance from the Four Seasons Opera House to the south-east, and the theatre district immediately south.



The overall design of 180 Queen West was driven in the first instance by its obligation to address this confluence of distinct urban conditions, and included leasable space at street level for mixed-uses and as part of a broader strategy to extend the vibrancy of Queen West to University Avenue.
