

Another attractive residence from Seattle based Adams Mohler Ghillino Architects, Livability on a tight urban lot is enhanced through creative, efficient and flexible use of space. The shed-roofed upper floor of the main house rests above an open ground floor living space while a detached accessory structure serves as garage, office, playspace or guest quarters.

The full length of the site was designed as an alternating series of indoor and outdoor rooms with a continuous cedar clad wall visually connecting the spaces. The relationship between inside and out is blurred through the use of slide/fold doors that open the full width of the living space to the exterior at both ends. With the doors open, the living room becomes a porch to the street allowing the owners to interact with neighbors and passersby while the dining room extends to a private terrace and garden.

Given site and program, we were able to create a sense of space that is both functional and north

Interior view of the living area, showing the grey sofa, wood-clad walls, and open-plan layout leading to the kitchen and outdoor space.

Black and white photo of the interior of the house, showing a bedroom with a bed, a chair, and a window. The text is partially obscured by a large, bold, black watermark.

