
A former side street just off South State Street in Chicago received a beautiful makeover, thanks to a spring-like sculptural grove designed by Rios Clementi Hale Studios.

RCH transformed Quincy Court, a remnant of an old downtown street, into an engaging gathering place for Chicagoans and visitors. Using bold graphic forms, they provided canopy elements, a variety of seating configurations, and hardscape improvements to the half-block space.

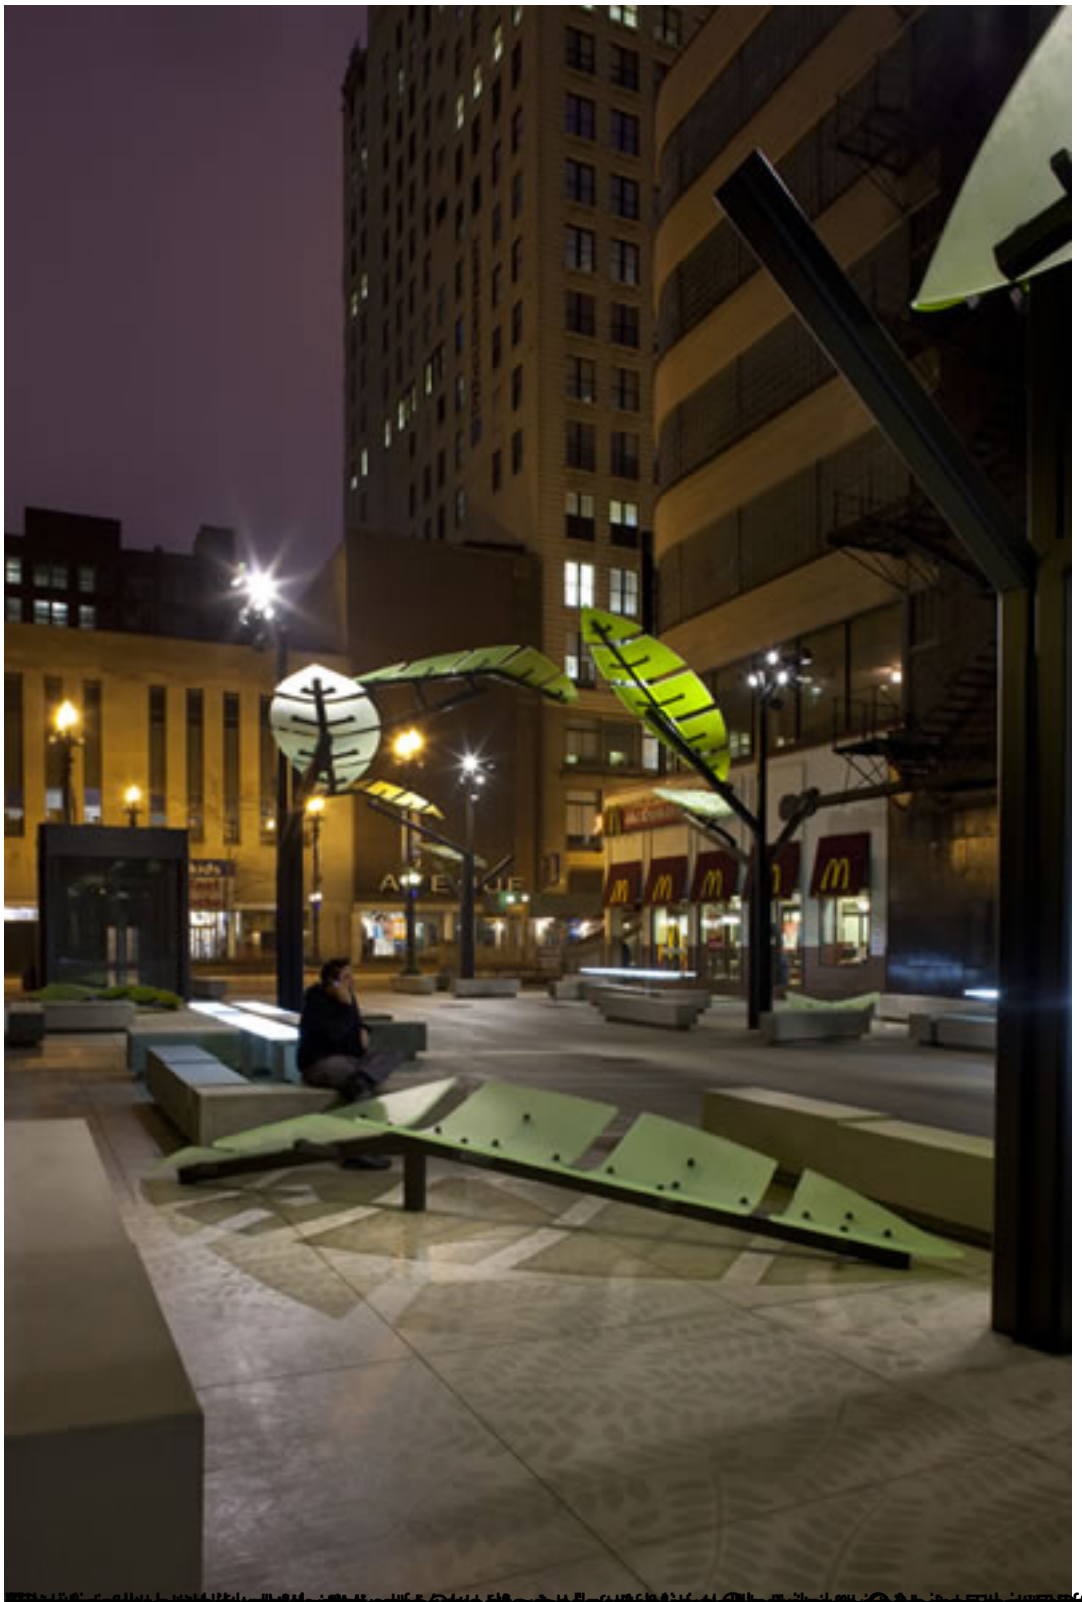
Quincy Court and adjoining properties were acquired by the U.S. General Services Administration (GSA) to provide added security and future expansion for the federal government's downtown Chicago campus. The more immediate goal was to upgrade the look and feeling of the space to make it more appealing for public use.


Payless Shoes Source