

The project demonstrates how architecture can delicately integrate in nature. Designed by Graça Correia and Roberto Ragazzi, it is located on a plot bordering the Cavado River in the Gerês region of Portugal.

It elegantly composes with the natural surroundings, as its pure volumetric form with its concrete finish anchors itself on one side, and then protrudes in the air with an impressive cantilever that points toward the river. The generous use of glass reflects the image of the luscious flora and diminishes the presence of the house within the natural site.

Photograph courtesy of Luis

The house is built on a hillside, surrounded by trees, and is a perfect example of modern architecture in a natural setting.

Photograph courtesy of Luis Ferreira Alves

Photograph courtesy of Luis Ferreira Alves

Photograph courtesy of Luis Ferreira Alves

