

On Friday April 24th at 11 a.m. the new Church in Foligno, designed by Architects Massimiliano and Doriana Fuksas, is being inaugurated.

The project was won in 2001 after a national competition organized by the Conferenza Episcopale Italiana for the construction of new churches, the jury explains the reasons for choosing this project, perceiving it "...as a sign of innovation that meets the latest international research, becoming a symbol of rebirth for the city after the earthquake. ~~The church in Foligno, Italy, designed by Massimiliano and Doriana Fuksas, is a prime example of modernist architecture. It features a minimalist design with clean lines and a focus on light and space. The interior is characterized by large, light-colored concrete blocks and walls, creating a sense of depth and volume. A prominent feature is a large, cantilevered concrete slab that extends over the central area. The ceiling is high and white, with several simple, conical pendant lights suspended from it. In the background, a low, rectangular altar is visible, set against a wall of textured stone. The floor is a smooth, light-colored material, possibly polished concrete, which reflects the ambient light. The overall atmosphere is serene and contemplative, with a focus on geometric forms and natural materials.~~

Massimiliano and Doriana Fuksas - Church in Foligno, Italy. The church is a minimalist, open-plan structure with white walls and a dark floor. The interior is illuminated by several large, angular, white pendant lights hanging from the ceiling. Light enters through various openings, casting shadows on the floor. The space is bright and airy, with a focus on geometric forms and light.
