

The Silverman Residence, juxtaposed in a non-descript neighborhood in Scottsdale, Arizona renders itself as architecture.

Upon approach, the street side façade (North Elevation) is a composition of white stucco finished volumes which are unified by a cantilevered steel structural element painted black. The steel element comprises an entrance canopy to the North and a balcony to the South that overlooks a lap/reflecting pool, as well as, the man made lake of which the neighborhood surrounds.

Upon entering the residence, a soaring volume is immediately encountered providing views to both the lower and upper level of the residence. The only demarcation between the two levels is a simple glass railing, creating a spaciousness not normally introduced into residential construction.

All photographs courtesy of Bill Timmerman

© 2009 Michael P. Johnson Design Studios. All rights reserved. This document is the property of Michael P. Johnson Design Studios and is not to be distributed, copied, or reproduced without the written permission of Michael P. Johnson Design Studios.