

This home, is situated on the edge of a forest preserve. John Ronan explores the relationship between site, material and program in a domestic environment. The site, urban on one side, falling away into a forest preserve on the other, yields a building of two characters: a low, more private “urban” façade in the front gives way to an all-glass two-story wall in the rear.

View of the house at the edge of the forest in Northbrook, Illinois. The house is a modern, single-story home with a minimalist design. The house is surrounded by lush green trees, and a paved driveway leads to the entrance. The photo is credited to Steve Hall © H.

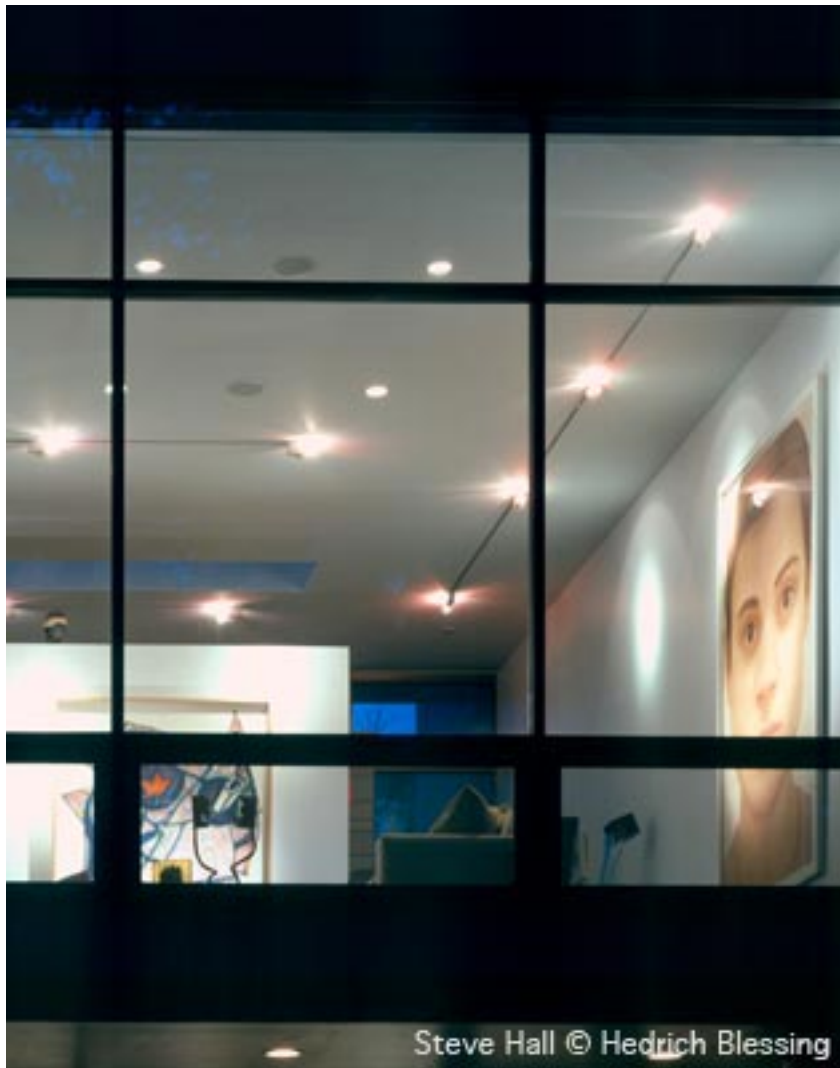

Steve Hall © H

syndicated) was made possible by the generous support of the (for a full list of

Steve Hall © Hedrich Blessing

using the highest quality materials for the interior and exterior finishes, and making the overall experience to

